Why we need to be more information literate?

By Dr. Pierre

We live and work in a multicultural, diverse global economy where the expectations and effort to be a good leader are even greater.

The key to becoming an effective leader is to take a practitioner and make him or her a scholar or at least proficient in scholarly research. One's ability to create scholarly research that informs practical, real-world problems that bring about actionable results is the driver of successful leadership.

Breivik's argues that newer technologies like the Google search engine have made it very easy for one to access information but have also made information less reliable and predictable due to scams and the commercialization of the data available (p. 22). Breivik's concludes that the 21st-century student needs to be more information literate, and education institutions need to help make it happen (p. 23).

Time is running out, and we need to close the gap between literacy conditions and literacy expectations. As technology and information become easier and easier to use at everyone's fingertips, we need to stop the unreliability and unpredictability of quantitative information overload.

A revolution in thinking is required, where one needs to not only appreciate the value of critical thinking but needs to be hungry to know the truth.

Academic Institutions and Professional Training Centers must step up their game and provide the right awareness, training, and insight to make this a successful and non-negotiable journey for every student and professional.

Frequently Asked Questions

Is Genesis really Tuition-Free?

Genesis University is an affordable and cost-effective solution where we have minimized our costs to fees that just cover our internal costs. We do not charge a per credit hour tuition like the traditional Universities.

Hence we proudly consider ourselves a Tuition-FREE online education, and our sustainable model is based on nominal fees per program and courses needed to cover our costs.
